Clerks, Crooks and Combatants: The Untold Stories of British Non-Elites in Occupied Egypt, 1882-1922

Abstract

Egypt during the British occupation (1882-1922) was a strategically important site for securing British interests in the region. Most studies of the British in Egypt during this time tend to focus on the British elites in business, the military and the civil service. However, further examination of private manuscripts, census data, court records and business and missionary archives challenges the commonly-held impression that the British community in Egypt during this period consisted solely of those from the law-abiding upper and middle-classes. Accounts of Britons from the lower and working classes as well as those who engaged in professional misconduct and criminal activity have largely been missing from the historical literature. This paper tells the stories of lower class Britons such as clerks, tradesmen and carriage drivers. It compares their income levels with their counterparts in Britain to discern their possible motivations for working in Egypt and considers the hardships and snobbery that they encountered. The discussion also brings to light the criminal behaviour of the British in Egypt and focuses on particular villains guilty of fraud and theft. Finally, it explores some of the incidences where non-elite Britons in Egypt were at odds with the British authorities, particularly during the revolutionary period of 1919-1922. Since little research has been done regarding lower and working class Britons in Egypt and those who were criminals during the British occupation, this effort hopes to contribute to Egyptian history, ‘history from below’ or the history of non-elites, the burgeoning field crime history, and the various expressions of British imperial history.
